As in the suburban districts it is future traffic that is to be provided for, traffic counts will have relatively slight bearing on such estimates. The minimum provision, except possibly for short one-way lanes, is two lines. The majority of local streets should have pavements wide enough for three lines and no more. It has been the custom throughout the middle west to pave local streets thirty-five and forty feet wide, thereby wasting large sums of money, and usually making it impossible to lay the best type of pavement, owing to the great expense. Twenty-four feet of pavement is wide enough to allow a vehicle to pas? down the middle of the street between two others standing at either curb, or to pass on either side of a vehicle moving slowly down the middle. Except on local streets, however, there should normally be an even...
